TENURE-TRACK FACULTY OPENING
Supply Chain Management
Baruch College, The City University of New York

The Operations Management Group in the Zicklin School of Business, Baruch College, seeks an experienced faculty member for the following complementary institutional needs:

- Conducting research in one or more areas within operations and supply chain management and/or analytics.
- Actively leading/contributing to the development of a premier business education program in supply chain management in New York City.
- Teaching analytics in a cross-functional graduate program in business analytics.

Our ideal candidate will therefore have expertise in one or more branches of data science broadly defined, experience in supply chain program development, established research interests in such areas, and demonstrated teaching excellence. Other desirables include experience developing partnerships with industry, a background with supply chain tools such as SAP/Oracle, and the ability to teach operations and supply chain management courses in existing MBA and BBA programs. Exceptional experience and accomplishments in any one capability may be substitutable, in part, for credentials in other areas.

A PhD in a relevant field is required and the position is open at the associate or senior assistant professor level. More junior candidates will be considered if they have significant practical experience in supply chain management.

Baruch College is located in Manhattan’s historic Gramercy/Flatiron district between Midtown and Wall Street and offers significant professional opportunities to interact with supply chain professionals in the retail, financial services, transportation, healthcare, and government sectors. The Zicklin School of Business is New York City’s premier public business school with an international reputation for excellence in offering nationally-ranked business degrees including BBA and MBA programs, specialized masters, and doctoral programs. The department offers both MBA and BBA majors in Management with a concentration in Operations Management.
Department representatives encourage informational meetings with interested academics at the 2014 INFORMS and DSI national conferences. To schedule an informational session, please email a cover letter and CV to:
